Aminoterminal pro-B-type natriuretic peptide in myocardial ischaemia and infarction. Plasma levels of B-type natriuretic peptide (BNP) are elevated in acute myocardial infarction (AMI) and are correlated with infarct size and left ventricular function, but whether this peptide is released from myocardium during myocardial ischaemia is unknown. We, therefore, investigated the release of aminoterminal pro-BNP (NT-proBNP) in coronary artery disease (CAD). We measured plasma NT-proBNP in 46 patients undergoing routine coronary angiography (CAG) and in 30 controls. Sixteen of the 46 patients subsequently had CAG because of recent angina but were excluded from the study. Plasma NT-proBNP was assessed both before and after a 30-minute occlusion of the left anterior descending artery (LAD) in 25 patients with significant (> 50%) stenosis of the LAD (group 2) or with normal left ventricular function
