I am wondering why bash interprets IFS= as an error when I do: $ echo SIFS $ echo SIFS $ echo SIFS ^A $ echo SIFS $ echo SIFS A: It's documented in the manual, in the second column of the first page. Bash splits each line of an input into words on word boundaries and separates each argument in turn by spaces. BASHPID is expanded and tacked onto the end of each argument. The first item in the table is If a variable is referenced in a redirection, command substitution, or arithmetic expansion that occurs in the same word as another variable reference, the references are merged. If the two variables are not merged, the result of the merge is the unmerged variable. So $./script.
