Referring to FIG. 1, a conventional side-by-side refrigerator 2 includes a body 4 defining a storage compartment 6 therein, a door 16 pivotally mounted to the body 4 to selectively close and open the storage compartment 6, a handle 14 mounted to the body 4 to selectively open and close the door 16, and a drawer 18 slidably mounted in the body 4 for selectively opening and closing the storage compartment 6. The drawer 18 includes an inclined shelf 20 mounted therein to store food items in the storage compartment 6. When not in use, the handle 14 is pulled outwardly relative to the body 4, thereby opening the door 16 to permit insertion of an outer container (not shown) into the storage compartment 6. Each of the body 4 and the drawer 18 is formed as a steel panel with a convex curved side. Accordingly, a side-by-side refrigerator 2 is usually heavy in weight. In order to reduce the weight of a refrigerator, it has been suggested to increase the size of the panel forming the body and the drawer. However, the increasing size of the body and drawer is accompanied by an increase in the size of a gap between the edge of the door and the side of the drawer adjacent the edge of the door so as to form a space to hold the door. Accordingly, the conventional side-by-side refrigerator has an increased size of the side of the storage compartment, which is undesirable. It is, therefore, an object of the present invention to provide a door support structure for use in a refrigerator to minimize the size of the gap between the edge of the door and the side of the drawer adjacent the edge of the door, thereby minimizing the size of the space for holding the door. In accordance with one aspect of the present invention, there is provided a door support structure for use in a side-by-side refrigerator comprising a drawer unit having a pair of spaced apart side walls and a front wall extending therebetween, the side walls each having a convex side. A door unit has a top wall and a pair of spaced apart side walls, the side walls each having a concave side, with each of the side walls of the door unit and each of the side walls of the drawer unit disposed in face-to-face relationship. A flange extends from the convex side of the drawer unit, and an inclined space is defined by the flange and the concave side of each of the side walls of the drawer unit. An arm member extends from each

Little is known about the relative risk of toxocarasis among wildlife. It is difficult to assess the importance of such exposure to the disease in humans, especially when the data for different species are so dispersed. The threat of a problem of toxocarasis is greatest when wildlife are at the apex of the food chain. In addition, increased contact with a wildlife species should reduce the risk. If the risk associated with toxocarasis in wildlife is high, prevention of further increase of toxocarasis in humans should be an important goal. We have proposed four areas in which risk assessment of toxocarasis in wildlife could be developed. First, knowledge of the relative importance of different species of wildlife in the food chain should be determined. Second, biological and clinical manifestations of toxocarasis in wildlife should be more clearly defined, and the role of the infective stage of Toxocara species in these animals more clearly delineated. This in turn should lead to a better understanding of the risk of toxocarasis in wildlife. Third, there should be more field research on the epidemiology and pathology of the disease in wildlife. Fourth, more laboratory research should be undertaken on the natural history of Toxocara infection in wildlife. This research should include studies of the anatomy and histopathology of the disease in various species of wildlife, in addition to the use of laboratory models to study the development of the adult stage of Toxocara infections in these animals.
