The role of liquid alkali in the synthesis of 2-(acetoxyethoxy)alkanoates and glycols using the soluble form of glycerol dehydratase. Liquid alkali is not normally used in the synthesis of 2-hydroxypropanoic acid and alkyl glycols using glycerol dehydratase (GDH). This study was conducted to compare GDH activity in both the soluble and the insoluble form. When potassium is used as the alkali, the glycerol loss of the soluble form is much larger than that of the insoluble form. The glycerol loss of the soluble form of GDH was in parallel with a smaller production of 2-(acetoxyethoxy)alkanoic acid than that of the insoluble form. This indicates that when potassium is used as the alkali, GDH loses glycerol from the reaction. When sodium is used instead of potassium, 2-(acetoxyethoxy)alkanoic acid was still produced, but not so much. Glycerol loss from GDH followed by the synthesis of 2-(acetoxyethoxy)alkanoates was also observed with lithium, so that the amount of 2-(acetoxyethoxy)alkanoic acid produced was not so much in comparison to the amount of glycerol loss. The glycerol loss followed by the synthesis of 2-hydroxypropanoic acid was observed when lithium was used instead of sodium in the GDH reaction, but the amount was not so much in comparison to the amount of glycerol loss. The production of glycols, such as 2-hydroxypropanoic acid and ethylene glycol, from glycerol could not be observed in the soluble form of GDH. The results suggested that GDH contained in both the soluble and the insoluble form contributed to the synthesis of 2-hydroxypropanoic acid and ethylene glycol, whereas only the GDH in the soluble form was involved in the production of 2-(acetoxyethoxy)alkanoic acids. The effects of single and repeated doses of arylsulfonamidopyridazine maleate on the electrocardiogram in the rat. The effects of arylsulfonamidopyridazine maleate (ASPM), an anti-tubercular agent and myocardial depressant, on the electrocardiogram (ECG) were examined in the rat following single and repeated oral doses. The findings indicated that ASPM in sub-anaesthetic doses (5 and 10 mg/kg) caused only a slight depressant effect on ventricular and arterial blood pressure. The ECG changes induced were only slight and did not progress beyond an initial minimal depression of the ST segment. In contrast to this, higher doses of ASPM (20, 30, and 40 mg/kg) produced an almost immediate depression of the ST segment, a progressive bradycardia which was not readily reversible by atropine, and occasionally an increase in the duration of the QT interval. The findings are discussed in relation to ASPM pharmacology and the risks associated with its use. Second Life Vlog I'm a voice over artist and Vlogger.
