What's New In?

In a high-volume, low-time frame environment, and where information is supplied, and decisions are made, asynchronously, what is the best way to achieve a given goal? The examples we all experience daily, show that at any given moment, things change and there are only so many resources available. In order to create an environment, and a process that is resilient, it is important to have in place the tools, and the concepts, to drive the evolutionary, high-velocity, low-time, near-constant, feedback, and streamlined decision-making process. So, what are these tools? The first, and most important, tool is being a validator. In other words, being the most informed person in the room. The most informed person in the room means that: • You are listening, and taking in all the information and using this information, as efficiently as possible, to make a decision • You are not distracting others • You are not purposely or unintentionally influencing others to influence a decision, and • You are making a decision based on all available information that is relevant to the current situation or the decision. When you consider that you might be adding an additional person to the team, and that person happens to be the best in the room, you are placing yourself in a position where you can make the best decision. There are tools that can make this decision making process easier. One of the most important tools, and one that has been oft-overlooked, is the ability to track the causes of failures. If you are not able to track the causes of failures, you have no ability to learn or fix the problem. In the case of a web or mobile application, the first step in troubleshooting is tracking down a failing use case or feature. The next step is to track the impacts that this failing use case or feature is having on the business processes. The third step is to track and measure all of the links that are responsible for a feature's failure. When you follow these three steps, you are able to evaluate at the end of the process, how and what caused the failure, who is responsible for fixing the problem, and what caused the problem to occur in the first place. The last tool that is needed to achieve efficient decision-making is a historical repository of events. This repository has events that you are aware of, are using
