Compare test scores of Asians and whites on Stuyvesant High School test (when I was there.) - amichail The results here seem to suggest that many Asians are not as good as whites on the test. Are Asians underrepresented in this environment?PS: I heard that according to school records at MIT, Asian students have higher academic average than whites. I believe this is due to admitting kids on the basis of their grades in high school. Is this statement accurate? ===== noodle sure, the article insinuates that asians are underrepresented (that it is a big problem), which i think is a way of saying they aren't represented as well/at all on a relative basis. all the asian kids i went to high school with were/are awesome, but there were also lots of white kids that were/are awesome, too, so the balance didn't seem to be nearly as skewed as you would assume. i don't have any insight into how the test works or how it is administered, though. ----- yan That's because most Asians don't get high

Cardiac output (CO) is an important indicator of the overall circulatory status of the patient. In the management of acute coronary syndromes, the higher the CO, the better the collateral circulation and less likelihood of in-hospital mortality. Among patients with coronary artery disease receiving aspirin or thienopyridines, higher CO was associated with less risk of death, myocardial infarction, and urgent revascularization. Thrombolytic treatment increased CO. Among patients with myocardial infarction treated with heparin, those with higher CO had less need for coronary angiography or coronary intervention. Hypercoagulable states including diabetes and heparin therapy are associated with both lower and higher CO. In the absence of a systematic evaluation of CO, the randomized trials with clopidogrel failed to show clinical benefit. One potential explanation is that clopidogrel, by inducing a reversible inhibition of ADP-mediated platelet aggregation, can increase CO resulting in a higher risk of bleeding and death. The contribution of CO to the management of a patient with atrial fibrillation is considered, as are the complexities involved in both dobutamine and vasodilator stress echocardiography. In conclusion, CO is an important parameter in the diagnosis and management of several cardiovascular diseases. d0c515b9f4
